Accelerating rates of breathing are frequently required during lung isolation with a facemask to facilitate oxygenation. The rapid inflation of a positive end-expiratory pressure (PEEP) manikin may be too difficult for patients. We hypothesized that the use of a "mask ventilation" maneuver (MOVE) would result in faster inflation than normal end-tidal CO2 (ETCO2) manikin breaths and affect the quality of ventilation. A randomized controlled trial was performed on an adult manikin to determine whether the MOVE maneuver improves the chances of rapidly achieving a target ETCO2 of 40 mm Hg during difficult mask ventilation. A fac
